Afghanistan Watchdog Warns of Deadlock if Selection Body Faces Obstacle

KABUL - A number of individuals in the presidential palace administration are preventing the selection committee for commissioners and electoral institutions to begin to work and are seeking to delay the practical process of electoral reforms, Afghanistan transparency watchdog said. Afghanistan watchdog warned that if the selection committee for the commissioners does not start to work in early time, the electoral reforms process will face deadlock.

"Unfortunately, a few individuals in secretary affairs are trying to build a long process that the practical reforms process does not start," Muhammad Naeem Ayoub Zada, head of Transparent Election Foundation of Afghanistan said.

In the meantime, electoral observers say that all of institutions have introduced their representatives to the selection committee and there is no reason for delaying the process.

They noted that by delaying the practical process of electoral reforms, the international community will no longer support the upcoming elections as well as ballot boxes will not be filled with Afghans' voting cards.

But the Presidential Citadel was said to consider the reason for delaying the work is that the Human Rights and Civil Society representatives are not yet introduced.
